Learning self-determination skills across the school years can help provide a strong foundation for success in adulthood. These skills can help a child to live a happy and productive life in which they will be able to develop relationships, have friends, be a part of their community, find meaningful employment and life independently as possible. In this workshop, we will learn how these skills need to be taught, provide the time to practice, and discuss ways to incorporate the use of the skills during the early, middle, and teen years.
